Violation of human rights in any form is a threat to social and economic development of State. Despite recognizing this crude form of violence against women at every level is at peak. The atrocities that are committed on women be it at the home front or outside have not abated and are rather mounting, escalating and swelling up every day at alarming proportions, courtesy to new technologies and methods. Detection of sex of the child and slaying the female foetus, cyber crimes against women, rape, acid throwing etc are all in vogue now a days. In various societies her functions have been relegated to do the household chores. Violence which is committed on her is such a scourge that not only tortments and maims her but also slays her - bodily, mentally, sexually and monetarily. It completely breaks and shatters the psyche of the woman and is not something that should be swept under the rug.

Although many legislations which are women comrades have been passed yet there are many questions which keep on haunting us - Is only law enough to bring about a radical change in the society which has since ages been ruled and dictated by men? Do they have teeth to bite? Do we really require rigorous or stringent laws? Will far reaching procedural and institutional reforms be of any use? Do we need to prevent violence before it starts? Can we say that better strategies or tactics or in other words culture change is going to help us out? Are causes like patriarchal society, traditions, caste system and sex based violence, illiteracy and servile mentality of women, the real causal factors for demeaning position of women and do they actually serve as a backbone for violence against women? Can education and self reliance of women help them in breaking all those old bondages and shackles in which they are presently trapped? Should ‘Men organization’ also come forward and champion for the cause of women? Can media play an important role in curbing violence against women or it just creates a build up and serves as a negative impact on people? Is equality still a dream which has till date not been realized?

These and many more questions of such nature crop up and require to deliberate upon.
